* Comœdia, æ. f. [a κωμη, vicus, et ωδη, cantus, quod initio vicis juvenes cantare soliti essent, antequam in urbes convenissent, Fest.] A comedy, or interlude. See the commendation, use, and end of it, in Donatus's Preface to Terence; its definition in Scal. Poet. 1. 5. It is either old or new. The old, whereof Eupolis, Cratinus, and Aristophanes were masters, is described by Quint. 10. 1. and the excess of liberty, its greatest fault, by Cic. 4. De Repub. The new differed from the old almost in every thing. In matter, manner, time, furniture, style, and verse. Their matter was almost as copious as that of Satire; every action and person, even the greatest commanders and princes not being excepted, and herein more blame-worthy, because it reflected on the good as well as bad. See Cicero in the place quoted. The new fetched its arguments from common life, as also its persons, who were generally young gentlemen in love, and their servants tricking their old masters to gratify their young ones. The old flourished about the time of the Peloponnesian war; the new when Greece had lost its liberty. The furniture of the old was very large; of the new, very small, the chorus being entirely taken away. The style of the old was epic or satirical; of the new, mean or low. The old admitted all kinds of verse; the new only iambic. The necessary parts of both are four, Protasis, Epitasis, Catastasis, Catastrophe; which see in their places.

D, the fourth Roman letter, is almost of the same figure with that in the famous Duenorian inscription, brought into Britain by William Sherrard, Doctor of Laws, and famous in many parts of curious learning: who, being Consul at Smyrna, ordered it with the utmost care and diligence to be copied from a huge stone lying still at Sigeum, where the literature used 2300 years ago, which was before the use of the long vowels and double consonants had obtained, shows itself not only to the wonder and admiration of the curious, but also to the great benefit and advantage of students and critics in the Greek tongue; especially as illustrated by the reverend and learned Divine and Antiquary Mr Chishull. In this monument the angles, which are unequal, come nearer the form of the Roman than the modern Δ, whose angles are equal, and therefore more easily slipping into the form of the Italian D, by leaving the left angle as it was, and circumflecting the two others for the greater haste in writing; which was done soon after, as we plainly see in the noble inscription of Herodes Atticus, that learned Critic and Antiquary, graven on his pillars exactly both in letters and spelling after the pattern of remote ages: vid. Gruter. Inscript. p. 27. Nor is it a wonder that the Latin letters are the same with the Greek, since Latium itself was called anciently Græcia Major. Thus much I thought fit to premise with respect to the form of the letter. · As to its name, this, as all the other letters, the Romans seem to have called by the Greek names, Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, &c. So Juvenal, Hoc discunt omnes, ante Alpha et Beta, puellæ, Sat. 14. 209.

So Cicero, Att. 9. 2. calls his country-seat at Formiæ, Digamma, because it begins with the Æolian F.

As for the power of this letter, it has a middle sound between t and th; and therefore has its place in the middle of the last rank of the mutes, and is a t hardened, as t is a d softened; which, as those of the other ranks, are frequently changed into each other, as from μυδος, mutus; from ακιδος, the gen. of ακις, sagitta; from αθηρ, ador: περθω, perdo; γαθεω, gaudeo. Neither does our English tongue refuse this change, as at from ad, what from quid, two from duo, and three, thrust, from tres, trudo; water from νδωρ. It also admits a substitute out of the second rank of its sisters to soften its sound, as quicquid, quicquam, quicque, for quidquid, &c. Neither does this letter refuse an intercourse with three liquids, l, n, r. To omit Greek words, wherein their mutual offices are most obvious, as less instructive to the younger sort, for whose service these notes upon literature, in the proper sense of the word, are principally designed; the ancients said dingua, sedda, for lingua, sella; cadamitas for calamitas; dispennere for dispendere; arventus for adventus; and this letter still keeps its post in arbiter and arcesso. It also corresponds with the solitary s, as Ῥοδοι, rosa. It admits before it in the same or diverse syllables, of the mutes, b; as βδεω, pedo, bdellium, abdico; and g, as ογδους, smaragdus; of the liquids, l, n, r, in diverse syllables; as calda, candor, cardo: and in the Latin tertius, and English Third, you have all the three of the last rank exemplified. In the preposition ad, almost before any consonant, d may keep its place, or be changed into the consonant of the beginning word, except b, v, and j; as, adcurro, or accurro, &c. but the change is more usual in many words, to make the pronunciation softer or quicker; for we seldom write adcommodo, adcuso, &c. indeed herein use is the best rule. This letter also was anciently used to prevent the collision of two vowels in different words, as, Censes med esse? for me esse, Plaut. which use it still retains in the same word; as prodes, proderam, prodire, for proes, proeram, proire. Yea, in the most ancient times, it was added to the preceding word even before consonants, as it should seem to make the sound more masculine, as in the Duilian or Bilian pillar, In altod marid pugnandod for In alto mari pugnando. Lastly, in numerals D stands for 500; being not a letter, but rather used for a numeral mark, as the Greeks use ϛ for 6, and ϟ for 90: for the numeral note of 1000, being CIↃ from the old ↀ, the half thereof is IↃ; which, for quicker writing, drawn close together, makes D.

E, e, the second vowel, and fifth letter in the Greek alphabet, from the Hebrew ה, to which it answers in alphabetical order, and from which it takes its figure; for by turning it to the right hand, to comply with our way of writing, stands thus ה, and by taking the separate perpending line, and joining it transverse to the foot, that it may answer the top line, we easily form E. There is indeed another figure of the Greek letter, but later, viz. ε, which our Saxon ancestors borrowed from them without any variation. This letter was both long and short in the old Greek, as it is still in most languages, who pronounce λεγω, and ληγω, though of a quite different sense, and innumerable such words, after the same manner; from which ambiguity often arises. To obviate this, and perhaps some other inconveniences, they invented H to express the long sound, or, to speak more properly, robbed their alphabet of one of its letters, which were but sixteen, and supplied the want of it by a mark of aspiration, writing ἑθμος for HETHMOΣ. But this only could supply the want of their banished H in the beginning of their words, therefore they found themselves under a necessity of inventing three letters more to express it in the middle, namely Θ, Χ, Φ. But of this see more in the letter H.

To proceed, this letter E in old Greek was pronounced like ει, as Ο was sounded like ου. In Latin it is changed into, and hath a mutual intercourse with, all its sister vowels, as they with it; into a, as from sero, satus, reor, ratus; so in like manner a into e, as tracto, detrecto; e into i, as, emo, eximo, perimo; as in like manner i into e, as eligans was written by the ancients for elegans, as Gellius 11. 2. tells us; and in some words these vowels are written indifferently, as heri or here. So Augustus and Livy, as we are told by Quintilian, Instit. Orat. 1. 7. took the liberty of writing other words, as sibe and quase, for sibi and quasi, supposing this way of writing came nearest to the common pronunciation; for e in Latin, as well as Greek, was pronounced ei; hence the Romans, in the three like cases of the plural number of the third declension, wrote many, if not all, words indifferently in is, es, or eis, as partis, partes, or parteis; and in the accusative and ablative singular of the same declension, in many words, these endings are indifferently used, as might be shown by innumerable examples. That e and o are thus interchangeably used, is evident in pendo, pondus, tego, toga, and in Greek λεγω, λογος, τρεπω, τροπος, so in like manner o into e, as from vos is derived vester; to omit that vostrum and vestrum, advorsum and adversum are read in pure writers. Lastly, the same is also observed in e and u, u and e, as in percello, perculi, perculsum ; juro, dejero, pejero. In the composition of diphthongs, e is a prepositive only in two words, hei and heu; subjunctive after words innumerable in a, as ædes, æger, &c. Also after o in words from the Greek diphthong οι, as οιστρος, œstrus, Οἰδίπους, Œdipus. In the contracted notes of the ancients, E. is put for Est, Ennius, Ædilis ; E. B. Ejus Bona ; E. D. Ejus Domus ; E. E. Ejus Ætas ; E. F. Egregia Fœmina ; Erigere Fecit ; E. F. vel E. FIL. Ejus Filius.

F.

F, f, Roman, and now in common use; Ff, ff, in old English, as commonly called, though long after the time of the Saxons, in modern use, but chiefly in acts of parliament and proclamations; F. f. Fal. which also is in modern use, the sixth letter in the Hebrew, Latin, and many other alphabets, may seem to have lost its place and figure in the Greek alphabet now used; but however, its place is supplied in the numerals by ϛ, which is called Βαυ επισημον, and its power of being a vowel, consonant, and quiescent letter, which it had in the old Greek alphabet, is still otherwise supplied. This sixth Cadmean letter answering to ו was first turned to the left, as its original, thus, ϝ, and afterwards to the right, F. The Æolians used the former way, and turned it upside down, thus, ⅎ. These people used it before soft vowels, writing ⅎοινος for οινος; for an aspirate, as, ⅎολος for ὁλος, also in the middle of words to stop a gap between two vowels, in order to prevent their collision, as οⅎις for οις. The old Latins also received it from them, only turning it to the right hand, and setting it upright as we now use it. They, as well as the Æolians, used it for h both in the beginning and middle of words, writing fordeum for hordeum, vefo for veho; and sometimes turned it into v, instead of oⅎις, writing ovis, thereby showing its affinity to the Hebrew vau. This letter being in the form of two Γ's placed one upon another, perhaps through the supineness or ignorance of grammarians, was, and so continues to be, called digamma. Certain it is, there is no affinity between the powers of f and g. In after times, this letter growing into disuse among all the Greeks, they cut an o into two parts, the former whereof they prefixed to words which anciently had begun with the letter h, or its substitute ⅎ, and the other half upon such as began with a soft vowel. The Latins also, both in the beginning and middle of words aspirated, resumed the old letter h, instead of fostis, writing hostis, and instead of trafo, traho. But though its place and analogous use favour its descent from the Hebrew vau, yet perhaps as much may be said for its pedigree from the Hebrew ה, and so make it difficult to determine in that matter. As to its figure it may be as well formed from ו, turning it to the right hand, and adding the middle declining line, as above; or from the final ף by turning it, and joining to the middle a small line taken from the top; or from the old Greek Γ by taking its short leg, and joining it to the belly. But when we carefully attend to the sound and power of this letter, we cannot but observe that it comes nearer to the sound of פ phe, and φ phi, than ve and vi, as our Western people sound it. And in Latin words of Hebrew extraction, פ is more generally changed into f, than v. Thus from the Hebrew פוא comes the Greek φυρ, and the Latin fera; from אור, fors; from פוך, fucus, &c. But since from what has been said may be gathered its relation to ו in place, and primitive use, and perhaps in its figure, but that in sound at least it seems more nearly related to the Hebrew פ or the Greek Φ, we may conclude it participates of both. And I am inclined to think, that a very probable reason may be given from such a conclusion, why the ancient Greeks so early dismissed this letter; namely, because having otherwise supplied the uses it had from the primitive ו, finding its sound nearly related to their Φ, they concluded they had no further occasion for it, and so left it out. But whether it comes nearer to v or ph, this is certain, whatever some great men may have argued to the contrary, that it is a mute, and of the first rank also. Nor is it any argument of its being a liquid, that we put e before it, calling it ef, analogous to the liquids el, em, en, er, (for so by the way we ought to call that letter, not ar, if we would keep to analogy,) whereas in the mutes we pronounce e afterwards, as be, ce, &c. For this custom hath no foundation in the nature of the letter itself, nor in the Hebrew and Greek tongues, who say not ep and eph, but pe and phe, pi and phi; but has obtained from the hypercriticism, perverseness, ignorance, or inadvertency of grammarians. And indeed, if this custom would prove it a semivowel, we must also adopt s into the family of the liquids, and, what is still more absurd, make a semivowel of two consonants, whereof at least they confess one to be a mute, namely, x, which they call ex, just with as much reason as they call f ef. Besides, f precedes the liquids l and r in the same syllable, as in flos, fraus, &c. and surely in Latin words two liquids cannot begin a syllable. G.

G, g, Latin; Ⓖ, 𝔊, in the old black English letter, as commonly called, in Hebrew ג, in Greek Γ γ, in both which tongues it is the third letter, was not in use amongst the Romans till about the second Punic war, being first introduced by Sp. Carvilius, as Plutarch informs us in his 54th Roman Problem; nor did they then admit it into its third place, invaded by the usurper c, now settled by prescription: however, they placed it in a good neighbourhood, between its kindred f and h, which, upon occasion, mutually serve each other. But though c may be justly called a usurper with respect to its order in the alphabet, we must allow it a kind of right, by having been invested with the power and sound of g. For it is certain that the old Romans, who wrote pucna and Carthaco, read pugna, and Carthago; otherwise, after the admission of g, they would still have retained the pristine c in these and the like words. If any should ask how the ancient Romans could know before this letter g came into use, where and what words to pronounce either sound? it must be answered, by use alone: For that this might be known so, may be exemplified by a hundred instances in our own language; to give only one, we are at no loss how to sound that and thatch, the and theme, this and thistle, thou and thousand, thus and thumb; and innumerable words of this kind. This indeed must be owned, that to give several sounds to one and the same letter, makes any language, and particularly our own, as in the above instance, more difficult to be learned, and especially by foreigners. To remedy which inconvenience, the Romans seem to have taken in the letter g. And here I cannot but remark how we have acted the reverse; they took in g, which they had not, to make their ϡ own tongue more easy, we have laid aside Þ and ð which we had, to make ours more difficult, which is very unaccountable.

But to proceed; from the Hebrew ג Gimel, which was emphatically called Gamla, from גמל a camel, because of the bunch on its back, the Greeks gave it the name of Gamma: some think the Latin G received its figure immediately also from the same letter; others from the cognate Ↄ, which, when turned to the right, (C|) much resembles G. I should think it more probably received its form mediately from the Hebrew ג, I mean from ר, since, as I before observed, the letter c originally had the power and sound of the after invented g, as well as its own; and so when the Romans admitted it, they might make it with good reason differ no more from c in figure, than in sound. For indeed these letters differ only thus, c is a softer g, as g is a harder c. Hence it comes to pass, that in declining, the harder g before a vowel is before a consonant changed into the softer c, as lego, legi, lectum, ago, egi, actum, &c. not legtum, agtum, which would be too hard. For this reason, jungo, rego, tego, &c. in the perfect tenses, are read before the formative s, juncsi, recsi, tecsi, not jungsi, regsi, tegsi: for so, if we may believe Isidore, before the age of Augustus such words were usually written, not by x: which, being only a more compendious way of writing, made Quintilian say, Instit. 1. 6. the Romans might have been without it; for they might have continued to write cs, or gs, as recs, apecs. The letter g sometimes also seems related to z, as we write indifferently zinziber, and gingiber. The cognation of this letter and c is so close, that in some words either of them may be used; as Caius, or Gaius; Cneus, or Gneus; vigesimus, or vicesimus, from viginti: and are often changed into each other, for as from viginti, comes vicesimus; so from centum, is derived quingenti. In Greek this letter, being in the middle of the second rank of the mutes, is changed not only into κ but χ also; as in the second conjugation, consisting of this order of the mutes, may plainly be observed; as lego, f. lecso, p. lelecha; instead of legso, lelegha, the harder sounds. I cannot forbear to observe here, that both the Greeks and Romans always, and before all vowels, pronounced this letter hard, sounding γενος and genus, γιγας and gigas, as we do in get and give, never as we do in generation and ginger; which irregular and uncertain pronunciation of this letter, as well as the cognate c, proves often a great discouragement to those who desire to learn our tongue; and, together with our different sound of the vowels, makes our Latin, though much purer generally than theirs, almost as unintelligible as our English. In the notes of the ancients, G. is put for Gaius, Gellius, gens, genius; GER. Germanus, Germanicus; G. Gemina, gessit, gesserunt; GA. Galeria, Gallus, Gallia; G. C. Genio civitatis, or Cæsaris; G. L. Gaius libertus; GL. VR. RO. Gloria urbis Romæ; G. L. Genio loci; GL. C. Gloria consulum; GN. S. Genio sacrum; G. V. S. Genio urbis sacrum; G.
